When is the best time for pup to leave mom?

When is the best age to separate a dog from its mother?

Behavioral scientists maintain, according to the Pennsylvania Veterinary Medical Association, that a puppy's age at the time it leaves its mother's litter has great bearing on what kind of a dog (and companion to humans) he will grow up to be.

Give or take a week, the best age is about seven weeks, the veterinarians say. By that time he will have been weaned and yet not have developed an undue attachment for his mother or creatures of his own species.

On the other hand, a puppy deprived of maternal care and guidance at three to five weeks of age is apt to become too dependent on human beings and forgo the companionship of his fellow canines or not even able to understand or conduct a "dog-to-dog" relationship later on.

Dogs who associate only with other dogs during the first three months of their lives may find man an insurmountable social barrier and chafe at domesticity throughout their lifetime. Behavioral scientists, being cautious and of course scientific, don't say, but that could help explain the hapless dog who digs up the peonies or bites the mailman.

Seriously though, if you're thinking of acquiring a puppy, one about seven weeks old is apt to develop into the most dependable companion.

A dog at this age has already had three weeks of socialization with its own species, so that behavioral abnormalities with its own species are less likely to occur at a later age.

This is also the optimal age for socialization with man, since primary social relationships can be easily established and simple obedience training, house-breaking and adaptation to the domestic environment can be most readily begun.
