

Grandview pupils at Marine Science Center

Fifty sixth-grade students and their chaperones from Grandview Elementary School have recently returned from a science fieldtrip to the Delaware Bay Marine Science Center. The Center, operated by the Marine Science Consortium (a non-profit, educational and research corporation of 18 academic institutions), is located at the mouth of the Delaware Bay, providing an excellent opportunity for study of both ocean and estuarine environments.

The students who participated in the three-day Pre-College Oceanography program lived in modest dormitories located on the premises of the Center. The program included a cruise on a research vessel, in which the students learned about and used oceanographic research methods. On a beach walk they learned about coastal geology and collected many live biological specimens for later study in the lab. Other fieldtrips included a study of life on a rocky shore, the ecology of a salt marsh, and a sand dune ecology walk.

Chaperones for the trip were: Mr. James Evans and Mr. Thomas Konas, sixth-grade teachers, Mr. and Mrs. Elwood Buckwalter and Mrs. Robert Schwert, parents, and Mr. Richard Rimert and Miss Patty Klem, student teachers.

Programs on their experiences have been presented for the other students at Grandview.

James Evans, sixth-grade teacher, feels the trip "was highly successful in that a better understanding and knowledge of the coastal area and the importance of preserving the area for the future generations has been achieved."
