

PP&L "double notice" plan

A new "double notice" protection service is being offered to customers of Pennsylvania Power & Light Company, the utility announced October 20.

While this free service is designed primarily to help protect people who are apt to miss or misunderstand service disconnection notices, it is available to any PP&L residential customer who volunteers for it.

PP&L views the procedure as especially helpful to the elderly, people with a language barrier, or individuals who are away from home much of the time.

What the procedure does is allow a third party to receive a copy of the "overdue notice" a customer would receive if he had failed to pay his electric bill. This is the notice that warns that service will be discontinued if payment is not received by a certain date. It is sent only after a late reminder-note failed to produce payment.

The customer may elect to have PP&L mail a duplicate overdue notice to any third party...a relative, friend, clergyman, physician, even an agency. PP&L states, however, that this does not place any obligation on the third party to pay the overdue bill. It simply offers double notice protection against a service disconnection.

PP&L will be sending special inserts with customers bills over the next two months explaining how to sign-up for double notice protection.

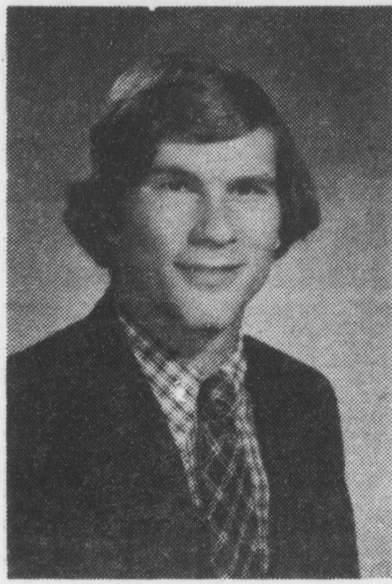

A survey questionnaire designed to measure the extent of electric power usage is now in the process of being mailed to a random sampling of 10,000 customers of Pennsylvania Power and Light Company, the utility announced today (Oct. 15).

In a letter attached to the questionnaire, Leon L. Nonemaker, vice president-Division Operations informed survey recipients, that, "the information received from you will be very helpful in our planning for electrical capacity when and where you and others want it."

The 28-item questionnaire seeks basic information on the living and home-making habits of customers in six major categories: the home itself, type of heating, laundry and dishwashing, cooling, food preservation and preparation, and other appliance usage.
