

Frozen to a Trestle-Bridge.

WEEDSPOT, N. Y., Feb. 15.—A most remarkable accident happened to a train on the Southern Central road, near here last night. Two loaded and thirty empty coal cars drawn by a good locomotive left Fair Haven and proceeded safely until the crossing of Muskrat Creek was reached. Here it was found that the water, backing up from Seneca River, which is unusually high for this season, had overflowed the track about four inches. When almost across the trestle the locomotive drivers refused to "bite" and the train came to a standstill. In a moment every wheel was frozen in its place. The train had entered the water just as it was on the point of congealing, and the instant the train stopped the conducting properties of the iron proved an efficient aid to complete the work. After several hours chopping about the drivers and tracks the engine was loosened and came to Weedspot. From here two engines were sent just after daybreak. Arriving at the creek, a third engine, from Fair Haven, was seen on the opposite side of the creek. Then the chopping and shovelling of ice began. The two engines would hitch on to one car, literally jerk it out, and the workman cleaned the track of ice, only to have it again covered by freezing water coming up from below. After the first start everything once loosened had to be kept moving lest the ice should once more fasten it. After the cars had all been started the three locomotives undertook to shove them up the grade and out of the slough. But this was not so easy. A film of ice constantly formed on the rails, causing the drivers to slip. The train moved one way, and stopped. The whistles screamed, and it swayed backward. One minute of idleness, and the ice would fasten every one of the hundred and fifty wheels again. The engines shook, rattled, jumped on the icy rails. Where the throbbles were not drawn with perfect concert of action there would be a jar, as if everything would be torn in shreds. At last, when the iron giants seemed ready to give up for very exhaustion—in the last thrust of two rods the steam in our boiler ran down from 130 to 105 pounds to the inch—the wheels bogged the rails, and the train was moved clear of the water. The watches showed 9 o'clock.

A Dog Detective.

The residence of Dr. P. W. Hiestand, at Millersville, Pa., was lately burglariously entered while the family were quietly asleep in their beds. The bold intruder bored a hole in the outer cellar door, through which he managed to insert some instrument and push back the inside bolt. In the cellar he found an ax, with which he cut a hole in the kitchen door at the head of the cellar stairs, and so succeeded in unlocking the door. In the kitchen he found and appropriated to his own use a pair of boots and twenty-five cents of milk money. In the kitchen was the doctor's dog, small and gentle, quite unable to cope with a burglar, but, as the sequel will show, possessed of that sagacity which often is more effective than mere brute strength. After the burglar had thoroughly inspected the lower precincts of the house, with the indifferent result above stated, he bethought himself of the more promising regions above. But no sooner had he opened the door leading up stairs than the little dog began his part in the drama. Quietly had that dog looked on while the villain prowled about on the first floor; without any audible protest had he seen his master's boots and the milk money of his mistress stolen before his very eyes; evidently the opening of the up-stairs door was what he had waited and hoped for. Unostentatiously insinuating his little body into the crack of the door made by the burglar in opening it, the dog passed noiselessly up to the doctor's chamber, and had told him of the robbery below and the danger above before the cautious thief had got half way up. Of course the doctor sprang to the rescue on the instant, and made some noise in doing so. The burglar heard the noise, hastily retreated, and made good his escape. But the house was saved, and saved by the dog, in a manner that would have reflected credit upon a two-legged detective.

A prominent physician of Peru, Ind., was called to the country last Saturday to see a child, a few months old, but before his arrival the child had died and had been laid out. Directly he came in the mother, noticing the child's head was lying a little crooked, undertook to straighten it, when the child gasped. This attracted the doctor's attention and he began to question them as to the sickness and treatment of the child. They told him the child had a bad cold, and they gave the child some patent cough syrup. It grew worse; they thought it had the croup; they gave it more of the cough syrup. The doctor saw in a moment the situation. The child was poisoned by opium. He prescribed strong coffee as an antidote, and soon the little one was running about the house.

A Cock Fighting Justice.

A cock fight took place Saturday near Ironton, Ohio, in the office of a justice of the peace. The officer was the owner of the birds on one side, and, what is more, his birds were the victors and he gathered his several hundred dollars of the money of his antagonists.

Factory Facts.

Close confinement, careful attention to all factory work, gives the operatives pallid faces, poor appetite, languid, miserable feelings, poor blood, inactive liver kidney and urinary troubles, and all the physicians and medicine in the world cannot help them unless they get out doors or use Hop Bitters, made of the purest and best of remedies, and especially for such cases, having abundance of health, sunshine and rosy cheeks in them. None need suffer if they will use them freely. They cost but a trifle. See another column.
