"A Predigious Fool," is the title of a novel by John C. Wallis, Esq., of this place. It is published by Lippincott & Co. of Philadelphia, which is a guarantee that it is handsomely printed and well bound. Some of the characters introduced are entirely different from those we find in daily life, but the story is well arranged and told in a smooth pleasing style, that not only interests but instructs. We have no hesitation in calling it a readable and entertaining volume. The title however we confess puzzles us, for we are not able to see why either character should be classed as " A Prodigious Fool." But you will want to read the book and having done so, perhaps what we fail to see, will be clear to you.

The Waynesboro' Gazette says: We witnessed a few days ago, a novel way of moving buildings, by means of a traction engine. The Geiser Manufacturing Company, of this place, has within two weeks moved two heavy frame weather-boarded houses by "hitching" an engine to them. The plan was to put a wheel under each corner of the house and then attaching one of the traction engines to it. The engines must be very powerful, as the buildings were very heavy and the engines "walked" off with apparent ease. The "moving" was witnessed by a number of our citizens, and the general opinion seems to be that the traction engine was boss of the situation.
