such as "Success for All" will curb the steady growth in the number on students in special education classes. "We have more children falling behind in grade level . . . Every year I've been on the board, we've put on new special education teachers," Tucker said.

Prior to Tucker's proposal, a task force had recommended that full-day kindergarten, computer labs, and foreign language instruction be started in September at two schools.

"I'm not against computers. But I think the students would interact with good teachers," Tucker said. "I'm asking, 'Is it better to implement a program such as this or better to go with computers?'"

Tucker's proposals to seriously consider the Baltimore program as an alternative to the computer-assisted programs and that a group from the Erie School District visit the Boston school passed easily at last Wednesday's monthly school board meeting.
