the world must follow the example of the Soviet Union. "Whole nations of people still believe that peace may be achieved." She also stressed that people must work together to achieve peace.

Since the event began three years ago, this is the first time an in-ground tree has been used.

"We'll use this tree from now on," said Vicky Kholmeyer, chairman of the Lion Ambassadors.

"They chose to use an existing tree rather than one that is cut for ecological reasons," said Weber.

Along with placing a bow on the tree, participants were asked to sign an oversized greeting card wishing peace. "We're talking about sending it over to Saudi Arabia," said Kholmeyer. The Lion Ambassadors hope to collect hundreds of signatures.

It is uncertain how long the bows will remain on the tree. "I would like to be able to keep them on until people come back from Saudi Arabia," Kholmeyer said.
